To the Texas Republicans orchestrating this grotesque redistricting scheme:

What you're doing isn't politics—it's cowardice in its purest form. You are not leaders. You are not statesmen. You are architects of a rigged system, terrified of voters you cannot control and too spineless to earn power the honest way. If you have to cheat to win, your policies are garbage and you know it.

You are mutilating democracy with a scalpel of racial suppression—dissecting communities of color, slicing through decades of civil rights progress, all so you can prop up your withering ideology on the backs of disenfranchised voters. This is not just unconstitutional—it's unethical, un-American, and unforgivably pathetic.

Let's be absolutely clear: Gerrymandering minority communities out of their representation is not strategy. It's vandalism. And history will not remember you as clever tacticians. It will remember you as cowards who tried to suffocate democracy because you couldn't win a fair fight.

Do you feel proud when you look in the mirror? Do you think your children or your spouses would admire the kind of legacy you're building? Or do you just hope they never ask? Because deep down, you know—you know—this is shameful. Not just controversial, not just political—morally bankrupt.

You are the problem. Not the system, not the voters, not the courts—you. You have chosen the path of petty tyranny over principled leadership. If this is what your party stands for now—minority suppression as a campaign strategy—then it deserves not just to lose, but to fall apart under the weight of its own cowardice.

Do better. Or step aside and make room for people with a conscience.
