

[REDACTED]

Date: 2025-07-25
First Name: Jessica
Last Name: Ajagha
Title: If You Have to Cheat to Win, You're Not Fit 2 Lead Organization: Not your business
Address: [REDACTED]
City: Houston
State: Texas
Zipcode: [REDACTED]
Phone: [REDACTED]

Affirm public info: I agree

Regarding: Congressional

Message:

I'm a single Black mother and a federal government contractor. I work hard every day to support my family, avoid relying on government assistance, and live with dignity. But the people running Texas aren't making that easy. In fact, with every policy they pass and every map they redraw, they're making it harder.

Let's talk about redistricting — because what's happening isn't just politics, it's manipulation. And I'm starting to believe the truth is simple: they don't think they can win fairly. That's why they're changing the maps. That's why they're silencing our votes and rigging the system.

And honestly? Only cowards pull moves like that.

They aren't drawing new maps to better represent us — they're drawing them to protect themselves. They're securing their own power while Texans like me are doing everything we can to stay afloat, keep our kids fed, and avoid falling into a broken safety net that's already stretched too thin.

Meanwhile:

Are they not tired of the homelessness crisis growing every day?

Are they not tired of watching more people rely on Section 8, food stamps, and Medicaid just to survive?

Because the decisions they make directly contribute to all of this.
Their votes affect whether we can thrive or whether we stay trapped — needing help, begging for resources, and being denied again and again.

Sometimes I wonder if that's what they want — for people to stay dependent, to keep looking to them for help just so they can say no.
Because power like that feels good to the wrong people.

But here's what they need to remember:

I could be their daughter. I may be Black. I may be a single mom. But I work, I sacrifice, I contribute. And when they make decisions like this, they're not just hurting strangers —
they're hurting people like me.
People in their own communities.
People they claim to represent.

We're tired. We see through it. And we won't forget.

If you have to cheat to stay in office, you don't deserve to be there.

