Message:

to Whom It May Concern: In the past, my civic involvement primarily involved volunteerism and voting. But in the last 2 decades I have become a highly engaged part of the electorate. I have sought to participate in our representative government by educating myself, my family and friends on the issues and by offering my opinions to my elected officials.

One of my biggest disappointments regarding politics and our government is the lack of ability or willingness to get hard things done. I am dismayed by how many things supported by the majority of Texans fade into oblivion at the hands of the minority.

I am hoping that legislators who abandon their obligations to show up for business will be facing consequences for their cavalier attitude toward their obligations to the people of this state. Being in the minority may a difficult position to be in but we have all been there. It is not a valid reason for refusing to participate in the dialogue and process of governing.

I suspect that redistricting is a desire of the majority of the state's population. So the minority needs to learn that in a democratic republic, the minority sometimes doesn't get their way.

I am looking for courageous statesmen to support and also for those statesmen who seem to lack the backbone and skills to do what is necessary to move the governing process forward.

Respectfully,
Mary Maxwell
