Message:

I am writing to express my deep concern regarding the redistricting and gerrymandering of Texas districts. While the redistricting process is essential for ensuring fair representation, I am increasingly worried that the current approach will exacerbate political divisions and harm the interests of communities, particularly in the areas of health and education which are especially important to me as a health educator.

When districts are manipulated for partisan gain, it results in a lack of accountability and representation for many Texans. Gerrymandered districts often dilute the power of communities that already face challenges, especially those in marginalized areas. This makes it harder for these communities to advocate for policies that address their needs, such as improved healthcare access and better education.

In particular, I am concerned that gerrymandering will disproportionately affect the state's most vulnerable populations—low-income families, rural areas, and communities of color—who are already grappling with limited access to quality healthcare and education. These districts often lack the resources necessary to address public health crises, provide adequate schools, and ensure that everyone, regardless of background, has the opportunity to succeed.

By redrawing district lines to favor political interests, we risk creating greater disparities in education and health services. For example, district boundaries may split communities, making it harder to implement comprehensive health initiatives and education reforms that require coordinated efforts across neighboring areas.

I urge you to consider the long-term consequences of redistricting decisions and prioritize fair representation that promotes the well-being of all Texans. The health and education of our state's citizens depend on it.

Thank you for your time and attention to this important issue.
