Funny how redistricting starts to feel familiar — like the kind of political theater we’ve seen in middle eastern countries that hold “elections” just to check a box for democracy watchdogs . In those places, maps are redrawn right before every vote, not to reflect people, but to erase patterns, bury accountability, and shuffle voters like cards — even the dead ones “show up” to vote.

Texas isn’t that far off when the process becomes a tool for power, not representation. When districts are carved with surgical precision to suppress certain voices and preserve others, it stops being about democracy. It becomes a ritual of control, not a reflection of the will of the people.
