To whom it may concern,

I'm writing as a lifetime Texas resident to express my frustration and concern over the blatant gerrymandering that continues to undermine the democratic process in our city. Austin has been sliced up in ways that do not reflect the lived reality of our communities. Neighbors who share the same grocery stores, schools, roads, and values are placed into completely different districts — often represented by officials who have no meaningful connection to the people here.

It's hard not to feel disheartened when you see your voice diluted by maps that appear designed to protect political interests instead of community interests. The current district boundaries are not just confusing — they're discouraging. It makes participating in local politics feel like shouting into a void, especially when the representative for your district lives hours away and doesn't seem to care about Austin-specific issues like housing, infrastructure, or public transportation.

We deserve representation that makes sense — geographically, socially, and politically. District lines should follow communities, not fracture them. They should be drawn fairly and transparently, with input from the people who actually live here.

Austin is a vibrant, growing city full of engaged citizens who want to participate in shaping its future. But to do that, we need districts that reflect reality — not the results of political manipulation.

Thank you for taking the time to consider my comment. I urge you to support independent redistricting efforts that put the people of Austin first.

Best regards,
Minister Steven Le-Nguyen
Austin, Texas
