Message:
To the Senate Special Committee,

Many Texans—including myself—are concerned that this redistricting process is being driven more by political motivations than by genuine need. When redistricting happens without clear and significant population changes, it raises serious questions about whether the goal is to serve the public or to maintain power.

Redistricting should not be used as a tool to consolidate power or control outcomes. When maps are redrawn without clear, population-driven reasons, it creates the impression that the voices of ordinary Texans don't matter. It deepens the belief that government is more focused on political advantage than understanding or addressing the struggles real people face.

Texans deserve a system that reflects fairness, consistency, and respect for all communities. I urge you to set aside political agendas and demonstrate that this process is about representing people—not managing outcomes.

Sincerely,
Taylor Wessley
