Message:

The attempt to redraw Texas' district boundaries under the current redistricting proposal, just a few years after the 2020/2021 maps were already established, highlights a clear pattern of self-interest by Republicans. This move comes off as less about fair representation and more about securing partisan advantage. What's especially troubling is the use of the Texas floods response as a bargaining chip to push through these redistricting changes. If Republicans truly prioritized the well-being of Texans, they would have implemented safety measures to warn communities of flooding, especially considering the funding allocated for such efforts in the past. This approach feels like a manipulation of urgent issues for political gain, rather than a genuine effort to serve the people.
