Message:
The recent push for mid-decade redistricting in Texas is a textbook example of partisan gerrymandering—a maneuver designed not to reflect population changes or uphold constitutional fairness, but to entrench political power. President Trump's direct involvement and the subsequent shift in Abbott's stance reveal how national political interests are steering state-level decisions. This strategy not only threatens fair representation for communities of color, but also risks triggering a retaliatory wave of redistricting in blue states, further eroding public trust in the democratic process Gerrymandering—whether through "packing" or "cracking" voters—is a distortion of representative democracy. If Texas proceeds with this plan, it may face intense legal challenges and public backlash, especially as voters grow more aware of how these maps are manipulated for political gain.

In short, redistricting should be about ensuring equal representation—not about gaming the system to protect a narrow majority. Texans deserve maps that reflect their communities, not the ambitions of Washington power brokers. Texas NEEDS leaders to represent the people of the State of Texas, those who elected them, and not bow down, with heads held in embarrassment like a punished child doing the bidding of the petulant President.
